

The combination of a modestly hawkish Federal Open Market Committee (FOMC) meeting, a recent downtrend in COVID-19 cases and the debt limit coming back to the forefront have helped push Treasury yields out of their summer ranges. The 10-year yield is currently approximately 1.52% after having traded in the 1.20%-1.40% for most of the summer. The 2-year yield is also trending higher. Despite these concerns demand remains very strong as we head into quarter end.

After spending most of the past month and a half moving sideways, tax-exempt yields broke to the upside in the last several trading days of September. The benchmark AAA 10-year tax-exempt yield has risen approximately 15 basis points in the four days following the conclusion of the September FOMC meeting, according to information provided by Bloomberg. Prior to that, 10-year tax-exempt bonds traded in a very narrow 4 basis point range since mid-August. The benchmark Bloomberg 10-year AAA yield is now being quoted at -1.10% while the 30-year benchmark yield currently stands at -1.625%. Tax-exempt bond funds continue to see net cash inflows, as they have for nearly every reporting week in 2021.
